Verbatim Growth Monthly Market Commentary - November 2022

November was a positive month for global equities, rising 4.2% in Sterling terms, as slowing inflation pressures led central banks to confirm less severe monetary tightening, which buoyed investor sentiment. There were also signs of China reopening from the zero covid regime.

Regionally, UK equities rose 7.1% as the Chancellor looked to restore the UK's economic and fiscal credibility with the announcement of the government's Autumn Statement which included proposed tax increases and spending cuts. Once again energy was a major beneficiary of these market moves. In other regions, Emerging Markets reversed previous losses ending the month up 11%. Despite weak PMI figures indicating a slowdown in economic activity, policymakers' efforts to support the struggling domestic property sector and further easing in monetary policy strengthened returns. European equities also rebounded in November, climbing 7.8%. Preliminary inflation numbers for the month showed the first easing in over a year, creating some optimism that the ECB might slow down the tightening of monetary policy if this pattern continues. US equity returns were modest compared to the other developed markets, up 2.1% (1% for the US tech sector). Q3 corporate earnings announcements continued to offer a mixed picture. Anticipation around the Fed's speech and Jerome Powell's statement for a potential moderation of rate increases, which could come as soon as December, moved markets upwards towards the last days of the month. In commodities, oil prices ended the month down 9.4%.
